Five planets are visible to the naked eye. With the aid of the telescope, Uranus was added to the list in the 18th century, and in the 19th century, Neptune. Astronomers predicted an even more distant planet would be found. In 1930, this ninth planet was discovered and named Pluto.

Recently, some astronomers have questioned whether Pluto is a true "planet" or not. It is even smaller than seven of the moons circling other planets, including Earth's moon. Its orbit is so strange that for a 20-year period during its long 248-year revolution around the sun, Pluto is actually closer to the sun than is Neptune, a feat no other planet comes even close to. Despite these anomalies, most members of the astronomical society still consider Pluto the ninth planet.

11. With the discovery of Pluto, how many planets are now visible to the naked eye?
    a. five  b. six  c. eight  d. nine

12. Which of the following statements is true concerning the size of Pluto?
    a. It is larger than the Earth's moon.
    b. It is the largest moon in the solar system.
    c. It is the smallest moon in the solar system.
    d. It is the smallest planet in the solar system.

13. According to the passage, which of the following is the smallest planet?

Do you know what time it is? Your body does, even without looking at a clock or a wristwatch. The body has complex processes that depend on the cycle of light and darkness caused by the earth's rotation.

When the sun comes up in the morning, your eyes send a message to your brain that it should start to wake up. Your temperature begins to rise, which prepares you to digest food and use it for energy. Your blood pressure also goes up in preparation for walking upright rather than lying down. Your liver is fully awake by midday, ready to help with the digestion of food. As night falls, your brain begins to release a hormone called melatonin, a chemical that makes you feel sleepy. Your temperature drops while you are sleeping, and the whole cycle begins again the next day.

To study this cycle, sleep researchers in Germany persuaded volunteers to live day and night in rooms without windows or sunlight. Interestingly, they found that the volunteers' daily rhythms changed a bit each day. Most of them gradually developed a 25-hour cycle instead of the 24-hour cycle of earth's day. The scientists concluded that the body does have an internal clock, but it depends on information from the outside world, such as light from the sun, to keep it on a 24-hour cycle.

Knowing about the body's daily rhythm can help us stay healthy in several ways. Jet lag, for example, is a feeling of exhaustion caused by a change in time zones that requires us to be awake when the body thinks it is nighttime. To reset your body's clock after traveling, you should spend time outdoors during the day, letting sunlight tell your brain to wake up.

The body's rhythm can also help us decide when to eat and exercise. A study at the University of Minnesota found that people who ate late in the day gained weight, even when they ate the same number of calories as people who ate earlier in the day. In contrast, experts recommend exercising later in the day, when your body temperature is highest and muscles are less prone to injury.

Your medical treatment can also be affected by the body's cycle. Illnesses that affect breathing, for example, are usually worse in the morning and better in the afternoon. If patients always have medical appointments in the afternoon, doctors might think that the illness is less severe than it really is.

___ 14. To lessen the effects of jet lag, travelers should ________.
   a. stay indoors after traveling.
   b. stay outdoors after traveling.
   c. go to sleep.
   d. stay awake as long as possible.

___ 15. The body's clock is controlled by ________.
   a. information from the outside world.
   b. our minds.
   c. our emotions.
   d. the time of day.

___ 16. The primary purpose of the second paragraph is to ________.
   a. show how light affects the body's clock.
   b. explain when we should eat.
   c. show how our body clock affects our health.
   d. show how body temperature affects our health.

___ 17. What can you infer about the writer's opinion of the research described in paragraph 2?
   a. He finds it interesting.
   b. He doesn't believe it.
   c. He doesn't find it useful information.
   d. He finds it difficult to explain.

A tip in South America, like in any other country, is given to reward good service. Usual practices may vary from country to country, even within regions in a country, but the normal guidelines apply.

However, even when a gratuity is added to your bill by the management, remember that a little extra directly to the person performing a service for you won’t break your budget, but may make a large difference to someone else. Pay the person directly. Don’t leave money on a restaurant table.

Where I quote a percentage, that is a percentage of the local currency. Where I suggest a sum, it is in US dollars. Of course, you will tip more or less depending on your situation.

Note: the question of tipping has raised some interesting points. Make sure you read the posts in the forum and add your opinion!
