disappearing in March, are still waiting to learn the fate of their loved ones. These two airplane tragedies disrupted the long-held illusion of a smoothly-run modern world.... The downing of another passenger plane, Malaysia Airlines flight 17, by missiles fired from a region controlled by pro-Russian separatists in Eastern Ukraine in July shatters another illusion: that war is an outdated affair in the modern world, taking place only in failing states and has no impact on people other than those directly involved in it....

The world also realized this year the weakness of international health authorities. The quick spread of the Ebola pandemic in West Africa reveals mostly not the well-known weak infrastructure of undeveloped countries but the astonishing lack of readiness of top health bodies such as the World Health Organization (WHO). Funding cuts amid global recession and the entrenched bureaucracy of the WHO resulted in a void that allowed Ebola to spread unchecked in the first months of the year.

In Taiwan, the seemingly endless food scandals have basically taken away whatever public trust still existed. Moreover, it represents a disruption of long-held beliefs that Taiwan is a “Food Kingdom” populated with honest people selling inexpensive delicacies. While there are no doubt many honest restaurateurs in Taiwan, the nation now finds itself in a soul searching moment with similarities to what South Korea faced after the sinking of the ferry Sewol: Have we compromised too much for speed and affordability?

Disruptions in 2014, however, were not all bad. The rise of social media and smart devices created many disruptions to long-established orders. Start-ups like Airbnb and Uber are bringing a sea change to the hospitality industry and taxi businesses. More importantly, technologies enable people to quickly organize events and spread information, resulting in “political disruptors” that seem to come from nowhere and suddenly take over. Taiwan’s Sunflower Movement in March and the recent Umbrella Revolution in Hong Kong are the most obvious examples. Thanks to these social media-armed disruptors, Ko Wen-je, a physician running as an independent candidate, made history by becoming the first non-Kuomintang candidate to take over 50 percent of votes in a Taipei mayoral election. Ko wasted no time in his first days as mayor to differentiate himself from traditional politicians. For better or worse, he is presenting himself as a disruptor.

2014 was the year when the people came to recognize the realities of the world. This loss of innocence started with the 2009 financial meltdown, which revealed the utter incapability of the sociopolitical elites whom people used to trust. In 2014, people learned that the world does not run on autopilot, that the “leaders” alone cannot fix all problems (in fact, they can sometimes be the problem). More importantly, they realized that they have to participate. Efforts to contain Ebola are seeing results recently because of the sacrifices made by brave volunteers. If 2014 was a year of painful reckonings, let us hope it will also be the beginning of an era of actions. (China Post, December 31, 2014)
